In accordance with ES 40-94, application of each of these alternate assessment methods includes acquisition and consideration of site information including tank age, existence of stray d-c current, presence of other buried metal structures, material of construction and electrical isolation, and tank leak and repair history. In particular, the UST must also pass a suitable leak detection test. These methods all include consideration of basic site-specific tests of the tank environment including: Stray current corrosion interference Soil resistivity Structure to soil potential Soil pH Electrical continuity isolation In addition, other tests may be conducted by a corrosion expert including measurements of hydrocarbon, chloride, sulfide, and sulfate ion concentrations in soil and resistance of the tank coating. Some state regulatory authorities have approved the use of these methods; however, others are withholding approval, pending an evaluation of their performance. The objective of this project was to observe and document the performance of the three alternative methods described in ES 40-94, as well as the existing method of manual internal inspection, in determining the condition of several USTs. Vendors of each method were invited...
