There is good rich feeding right through the year in these districts. Hay should be stored for the stock to feed on during the winter months, especially in the cold highveld. It is also of great importance that shelter should be provided for the animals as a protection against the bitterly cold winds of the highveld. It is of paramount importance in stock-breeding, firstly, to secure animals with robust constitutions; and secondly, to avoid over-stocking the farm. The grazing capacity of a farm is just what it can carry well during the dry months; frequently no rain falls between May and October, so allowance has to be made for the six intervening dry months. When, however, a plentiful supply of hay and other food is laid in, the farmer becomes independent of drought, and the capacity of his farm is greatly increased. THE BULL. The settler should secure a well-bred bull, with sound constitution and firm, well made, compact frame, rather small than large for his breed, and, if possible, one descended from pedigree cattle bred for many generations in South Africa. When he is acquired he should be kept in good fettle, and never allowed to be hungry, for he is a valuable asset and worth looking after. It is worth repetition that the native cattle, on account of their hardiness and thrift, resulting from acclimatisation through many generations, are more eligible for the Transvaal than those of Europe, it is said that...
